Hollywood glorifies Escobar, says late drug lord's son

The son of the late Colombian drug lord Pablo Escobar says a glorified Hollywood image of gangster life has wrongfully inspired young people to seek a life of crime.

"Today, 30 years after his death, Pablo Escobar generates more news than when he was alive," Sebastian Marroquin said of his late father at an event in the Chilean capital. Marroquin, 45, who stopped his father's surname in disgust decades ago, said he hears from young fans of the Colombian drug kingpin frequently.

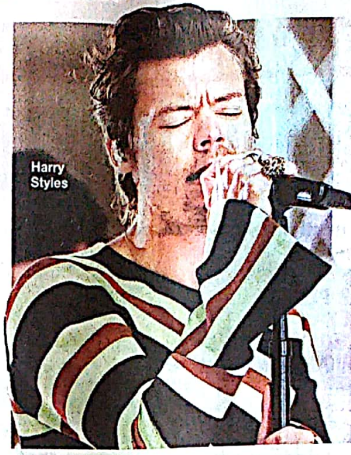

"Many young people write to me to say: I saw the movie or I saw the series, and I want to be like your father," Marroquin said. Marroquin, who is an architect and lives in Buenos Aires, referred not only to the 2015 series El Patron del Mal, a riveting look at how Escobar rose from petty crime to lead the world's biggest drug cartel, but also to general media coverage of what he called "narco culture." Police gunned down Escobar in 1993 as he fled across rooftops in his native Medellin, hub of his narcotics empire.

BIZARRE?

Some Karens are changing their name

In 2022, the name 'Karen' gained a lot of traction, and not in a good way. The once-popular name became a term used for White, middle-aged women who are rude, racist, and love complaining about the tiniest of inconveniences. But now, people who have lived as Karens for a long time are dropping their names like hot potatoes because they're done being mocked at.

In fact, the name is no longer in demand, and it was only registered for one child in the UK this year alone. Thanks to all the memes, no one really wants to have an offspring named Karen.

Author Karen Gross has stopped going by Karen and switched to just 'K'
